How Do You Like My Hair?

I FILM IN TASCA (Pocket films in Bari, Italy)

“How do you like my hair?” (Pocket Films - filmmaking & media studies through creative use of mobile phones) is one of the projects under ECFA’s Children’s Film First label, co-financed by the European Commission through its Creative Europe programme.

In Bari, Il Nuovo Fantarca, a social cooperative working in the field of media studies and video art therapy, decided to investigate an issue that is currently highly sensitive for parents, educators and teachers alike, i.e. responsible use of smartphones. How can the concept of responsibility be coupled with that of creativity, starting from images and video stories made by young people using smartphones? And how can we encourage school inclusion and facilitate in particular the participation of children who take little part in school life?

We invited three directors to help come up with an educational approach:
- Cross-media artist Giacomo Verde touched on several examples of video poetry. “The filmmaker looks for images in the real world, even ones that may seem banal or insignificant, and attempts to give them a new meaning.” Through several techniques (such as attaching a phone to one’s ankle and walking along with the camera on), he emphasized the freedom from the constraints of the narrative. The next day in a workshop, Verde had the young people working hands on, with their mobile phones.
- Roma filmmaker Laura Halilović made her debut IO ROM ROMANTICA using low-cost technology and experimenting with smartphones. The screening was attended by 280 young people, half of them Italians and half from Roma camps around Bari. In a debate with the director, the comments from Roma girls in particular, were moving. Egged on by the spirit of the film, they expressed the difficulties of growing up as Roma women, as well as their need to break with traditional patterns by which girls are married off while they are still children.
- Andrea Caccia created a feature film entirely with seventy phones given to seventy young people from different high schools. Each boy or girl filmed significant moments of their daily lives: thousands of files that Caccia moulded into VEDOZERO. Now, together with the youngsters she analysed the videopoems they made in the workshops. Even the most unruly, poor school performers created heartfelt, sincere videos, and had great fun doing it. The videos were then screened to the audience, with the young directors present.

In total, the project “I Film in Tasca” led to two seminars, four workshops, a cinema screening followed by a debate. Seminars were attended by adults (teachers, educators, parents and psychologists) and young students.

Rosa Ferro, artistic director Nuovo Fantarca

The full report of this event can be found on: http://cff.ecfaweb.org/seminars/bari/.

I tried to force myself to accept my body the way it looks.” For many women, beauty means being skinny and having no body hair at all. Emile is the very opposite. For her, womanli-ness is far from being a product of a society driven by beauty ideals. When it comes to men, her particular preference is regardless of the conventional beauty-clichés.

How do I see my own body and how do I get to accept it? What’s the effect I have on others? The film tries to answer these questions, critically reflecting on the significance that common beauty ideals have on one’s external and self-perception. In doing so, author and protagonist Emilie Blichfeldt gives an intimate insight into her feelings. At the centre of her adventure: an unexpected encounter, a hotel room, a musician, a big nose – and the question: “How do you like my hair?”

Grosse Klappe 2014

“How do you like my hair?” was awarded with the Grosse Klappe, the European film prize for political youth documentaries at the doxs! festival 2014. Ten adolescent jury members justified their choice by appreciating its strong plea for “acceptance of one’s own body” and lauded the film for being an anti-pode to the conventional image of women in media. Emilie Blichfeldt tells a very personal story and succeeds in offering a mix of re-enacted and staged elements, without making the audience feel like a voyeur.”

In LES OISEAUX DE PASSAGE, the new film by the brothers Olivier and Yves Ringer, two girls take pity on a little duckling. Cathy and her friend Margaux, who is in a wheelchair, want to release the little bird with his conspecifics. They follow the river, along the shore and on the water, all the way to the delta, on a journey that will change their lives.

ON THE SET: LES OISEAUX DE PASSAGE (BIRDS OF PASSAGE)

In the auditions all candidates were given three minutes to play a scene. Most girls handled the job quickly but Clarice tried to understand the text and corrected herself. She’s a mini-Robert de Niro. There was another candidate that looked very cute, but we prefer ‘authentic’ above ‘cuddly’.

Yellow prince charming

LES OISEAUX DE PASSAGE is not about living with disabilities. Margaux’s situation is no aggravating element to the story. Olivier: “Wheelchair patients lead normal lives. Léa is the best example: she doesn’t ask for pity. Margaux’s character is based on one of my daughter’s best friends who, despite her limited life expectancy, joyfully celebrates life to the fullest. As her speech problems increase, she has built up a special nonverbal companionship with her classmates.” Yves: “Our choice for Léa enhanced the authenticity. Her main problem is her mobility. Next week, when shooting out in the open air with boats and rafts, her ‘set supervisor’ will have to work his ass off, lifting and carrying her.”

The duckling is the film’s little cute ‘prince charming’. “Ducklings respond alertly to various impulses. They are affectionate and like to be petted.” On the set little chicks constantly come and go. Commissioned by the Ringers, two students coordinate the hatching process. “Every Saturday we pick up eggs etc. On Monday the new chicks arrive on the set little chicks constantly come and go. Students coordinate the hatching process. When the shells break, when the chicks hatch, etc. On Monday the new chicks arrive on the set. We work with them for 10 days. Watching the hatching is a moment of pure magic, leaving you speechless.”

Too cuddly

LES OISEAUX DE PASSAGE is made on a small budget with a limited crew. “Our previous film was made by just the two of us. An even smaller crew is hardly possible.” Olivier’s daughter Winona, main actress in ON THE SLY, still lingers around on the set as jack-of-all-trades, but this time, the production isn’t a family affair.

The Ringers are thrilled: “There is a magic bond between our two main actresses that radiates onto the screen. Léa Warny (Margaux) is bold and resolute while Claire Djuroski (Cathy) is rather introverted. In the auditions all candidates were given

Overprotected

LES OISEAUX DE PASSAGE fits seamlessly into the Ringers’ oeuvre: a film full of empathy. “Our films aren’t drowning in misery. We are the Ringer brothers, not the Dardenne brothers. But children today are flooded with cheap animation, as if we can’t tell real stories anymore.”

Just as in ON THE SLY children are running away from home to discover true life. “Our world is focused on danger, children are overprotected. Because we find security so important, ‘enjoying life’ comes in second place. LES OISEAUX DE PASSAGE shows that adventure and surprise are the things making life worthwhile (GH).
INTERVIEW WITH PIERRE DULaine (DANCING IN JAFFA)

I’m fighting what I see every day in the New York City streets

Pierre Dulaine is currently based in Lebanon, as a jury member for the Middle East ‘So you think you can dance’ edition. He took a few days off to visit Brussels on the occasion of the Film’ on children’s film festival. I’m rather wary, as the Mr. Pierre we see in DANCING IN JAFFA is so charismatic and ‘bigger than life’ that I can’t be but disappointed when meeting him in real life. But I’m not! Pierre Dulaine is a chatterbox, charming and eloquent, describing himself justly as ‘a people’s person’: “I’m comfortable with people” and he has the gift to make other people feel comfortable too.

Mr. Pierre: Jaffa was originally a Palestine city. That’s where I was born in 1944. But when the new people came in the early 40’s a high percentage of Palestinians fled from Jaffa. Only few stayed behind in their se- nescent homes, while in the city of Tel Aviv brand new villas were built by the Jewish community. Now both areas have merged into one big city. Many Palestinians in Jaffa don’t have the money or permits to renovate, so the old buildings are knocked down and new buildings arise.

What is your personal bond with the city?

Mr. Pierre: My grandfather bought 3 plots of land and built homes do: for the son, the daughter, the other daughter… I was born in one of those houses. But I was only 4 years old when we left. My emotional connection solely comes from what my mother told me.

Now you went back to Jaffa with a project...

Mr. Pierre: I have this program called ‘Dancing Classrooms’, a social and emo- tional arts and education program, designed to cultivate essential live skills in children through the practice of social dancing. I founded the program in 1994 in New York and it has now spread over 31 cities in 5 countries. The film TAKE THE LEAD (2006) about my life, played by Antonio Banderas, has helped the project spread all over the world. After working in ‘challenging schools’ in New York City, I thought it would be great to go back to Jaffa and work with both Pal- estinian and Jewish children to make them dance together. Dancing once made a big difference for me and I thought it could also make a difference for the children in Jaffa.

Failure was not an option, you say. We see you in some tough moments, when the project is taking a difficult start. How heavy was the pressure to make it work?

Mr. Pierre: I’ve had challenges wherever I worked, but never as much as this time. And I never before felt so much respect for what I did. Excuse me for saying this, but especially for the Arab children I desperately wanted this project to succeed, because they don’t have equal citizenship in Israel. I wanted to give Palestinian Israeli boys and girls a chance. When I can get an Arab boy to stand up straight, elegant, and dance with his partner, who happens to be a Jewess, he will realise: I did as good as she did. I wanted them to work together, being proud about themselves. This is something that happens to them so seldom. We were bringing lives in motion.

Let’s talk about dancing! Why ballroom dancing? Mr. Pierre: I’m not teaching them to become champions. Being a champion myself all over the dancing world, ballroom dancers are the worst for the job. I have developed the ‘Dulaine method’ to instruct teachers on how to work with children. It’s all about respect and compassion, about (body and verbal) language, humour and joy, being present, etc.

Throughout the movie, for me you’ve be- come the ultimate personification of the true gentleman. Mr. Pierre: The old school film stars only left their homes well-coiffed and dressed. Nowadays people care less. Working with children, I want to be a positive role model. I feel comfortable wearing a tie, looking as elegant as I possibly can. I wear my jackets buttoned, I don’t own a pair of jeans and I don’t have much casual clothes.

I share the old, polite manners with this new generation, fighting what I see every day in the New York City streets.

Does the film summarise correctly the achievements you made with this proj- ect?

Mr. Pierre: It’s all summarised in my two favourite scenes: after the competition, you see a crowded dance floor, all of them danc- ing meringue. Can you tell who is Arab and who is Jew? No. Then there is the very last scene: one Arab, one Jew together in a boat, rowing towards the future. A clever ending and a perfect metaphor for this film.

How will you ensure the results of the project will not vanish in thin air over the years? Mr. Pierre: We started with 5 ‘Dancing Classrooms’ schools in Israel. Several Jewish dancing teachers were sent to America for teacher training. But now we’re sending a hijab lady, 28 years old, who is going to be our new dancing teacher in Haifa. If I can get a Muslim lady to shake hands with a man and teach dancing… What a start! If you change the children, you can change the parents, and in that way you can change the world. During the dancing contest in the film, all parents sit together, cheering. One of them is a lady, completely covered. You know what she bought for her daughter? A fashionable maroon dress with spaghetti straps, because she wanted her to be amongst the others. (GH)

IN PRODUCTION: MELLOW MUD

Is MELLOW MUD (working title) the next Latvian teenage movie? “Not exactly,” says Alise Gelze from Tasse Film, producer of MOTHER I LOVE YOU. “I think every age-group will find its own specific emotional aspect in this story. By shining a particular light on harsh choices to be made in life’s crucial moments, the film could raise many questions.” MELLOW MUD (directed by Renārs Vimbā) focuses mainly on the 16+ age-group."

Raya (17) discovers a darker side of her personality when taking a conscious decision about leading a different sort of life from now on. After the death of their father and abandoned by their mother, siblings Roby and Raya are forced to live with their dominant grandmother in a small country house. Things change after grandma’s sudden death. The teenagers have to face a tough choice: either to report the accident and submit themselves to a life in orphanages or hide the dead body and go on as if nothing happened. Alise Gelze: “The film’s main emphasis is on the moral aspects of responsibility. Responsibility towards yourself, your dreams, your family and your state. This raises a dilemma for the teenagers for whom only ethically ambiguous or illegal behaviour can seemingly guarantee the freedom of their dreams.”

One way or another, such moral dilemmas sound very similar to MOTHER, I LOVE YOU! are both films nurtured by the same matrix? Gelze: “Everyone in Europe is concerned about immigration, but seldom do we think about the ones left behind, like children left alone without their parents and family. This lends a dramatic background to Roby and Raya, who stayed behind in the countryside while their mother left abroad in search for work and a better life.”

Tasse film will finish MELLOW MUD’s post production in the autumn 2015. The world premiere is planned for spring 2016.

THE ‘KAUWBOY’ CREW: T.I.M. and DISAPPEARANCE

In March, Boudewijn Koole (KAUWBOY) will shoot his new feature DISAPPEARANCE in Norway, in the Tremso region. The film, in which the incurable, young Roos travels to her mother to announce her imminent death and is confronted with long forgotten grievances, is made for an adult audience, but with an important role for Roos’ 9 year old half-brother, Bengt. Like KAUWBOY, DISAPPEARANCE is based on a script by Jolein Laarman.

Meanwhile producer Wilant Boekel-man has left Waterland to start his own company. Last year Dutch Mountain Film delivered its first family feature, T.I.M. (The Incredible Time Machine, by Rolf van Eijk) a surprisingly poetic science fiction adventure about a young boy who can’t say farewell to his out-of-date robot. Tibor tries to save him from destruction, setting out on a journey to find the legendary robot repair man Hector Sammler. During the adventurous quest however, T.I.M. slowly starts falling apart… In the Berlinale, World Sales agent Attraction (info@attractiondistribution.ca; www.delphifilms.com) schedules a market screening for T.I.M.

MOBILES IN MONTREAL

In 2015 The Montreal Int. Children’s Film Festival (known as FIFEM) is proud to launch the third edition of its online contest “My First Movie”. FIFEM invites children under 15 to direct a short film of a maximum 3 minutes with mobile phones. This modern and connected initiative naturally goes in hand with FIFEM’s mission to shape tomorrow’s film enthusiasts by giving them visual means to comprehend traditions and experiences that are foreign to them.

The call for entries started in the autumn and promotion is done via FIFEM’s website, newsletters and postcards distributed at various cultural locations in Montreal. The six finalists are chosen in February and online voting ends at the beginning of March. The winning film is presented during the closing ceremony of the festival. In 2014, more than 5,000 people visited the contest’s page, 50 films were submitted and over 2,000 votes were registered.

As a complementary activity to the contest, FIFEM organises hands-on workshops on how to direct a film with a mobile phone. Participants learn about every step of filmmaking, from screenplay to editing. They also have the opportunity to direct a short stop-motion film. The workshop is a creative way to connect with families and children and the feedback is always positive! (Jo-Anne Blouin)

CINEKID SCRIPT LAB

In 2014 Cinekid added a new initiative to its growing industry event; Cinekid Script LAB, a four-month script-training programme for writers with a children’s film project co-funded by film institutes from Belgium (VAF), Norway (NFI), Sweden (SFI), The Netherlands (Netherlands Film Fund) and Iceland (IC). The concluding part of the project takes place at the Berlinale 2015, where Cinekid also invites new funds to take part in upcoming editions.

Fleur Winters, Head of Cinekid for Professionals: “We at Cinekid found such a high profile initiative was lacking in the contemporary film landscape. For us, it felt like the right time to start the Script LAB which falls naturally in our overall Cinekid for Professionals programme. With Cinekid we now support the whole film production chain, from development to financing to exploitation and even distribution. And at the same time we offer participants a real ‘Cinekid connection’ as we will closely monitor the projects throughout these different stages, and support them wherever we can, i.e. through our Junior Co-production Market and Screening Club.”

Participants join with a project and for this first edition 5 projects in development have been selected, one project and one writer from each of the participating film institutes, with screenwriting experts on hand to offer guidance and support. Interest in this new programme has been extremely high – in Belgium the project received more than 50 applications.

The project lasts four months, between Cinekid in October 2014 and the Berlinale in February 2015. Esteeed youth film script coaches Mieke de Jong (NL) and Rasmus Holskaer (DK) guide the participants throughout the process, and push them to their creative limits. Teamwork, the interpersonal exchange of ideas as well as a safe and nurturing lab environment are the key pillars to the lab. Workshops and get-togethers with experts will provide in-depth knowledge of screenwriting. The participants are also granted direct access to the children’s film industry at Cinekid for Professionals and the Berlinale. (Tessa Stokes)

LA MATATENA’S 20TH ANNIVERSARY

The association La Matatena was launched 20 years ago to introduce Mexican children to quality cinema from around the world. They embedded a fundamental input from children themselves in a broader media education methodology. A creative encounter between children and audiovisual media, not only through the Int. Film Festival for the Youngest (& Not So Youngest), but also through cinema workshops. It’s partly on the superb level of animated films created in these workshops that La Matatena has built its worldwide reputation. Founder & director Liset Cotera: “La Matatena has always invested in making children spread their own messages. We have an archive of 150 animated films, made by Mexican kids.”

“We’ve tried to enrich not only children’s audio-visual perspective but also their hearts. We introduced them to stories with a wide variety in content that touched their souls and with which they could identify. I wish all children of the world had access to such opportunities. Quality cinema contributes greatly to their social development, it promotes responsible citizenship, transmits fundamental values and stimulates an empathetic understanding of the world we live in. This is what made me fall in love with this project.”

La Matatena is responsible for two decades of quality cinema, serving several generations of Mexican children. “It all sounds easy, but actually it never was. Demanding space for children in the Mexican film landscape has been a great struggle. Now we want to celebrate this achievement in the presence of guests from the world of children’s cinema. During the festival (August 4 – 9th) we’re planning several retrospectives and screenings of the best films from 20 editions.” Extending its network to other Mexican cities, this year the festival will also organize screenings and film related activities in Tijuana, in the North of the country.

The Festival Internacional de Cine para Niños (y no tan Niños), organised by La Matatena, invites you to participate in the 20th festival edition and is looking for films in various categories: Feature Films (live action & animation), Short Films (live action & animation), Documentaries for kids and also – in a non-competitive section – short films made by children.

REAL YOUNG

New documentary initiative presented at IDFA

Based on the enthusiasm raised by the recent seminar in Cologne, Meike Statema (IDFA) convened a special meeting during Amsterdam’s prestigious documentary festival to further support the young audience documentary movement. A perfect occasion to meet with ‘Real Young’, an initiative in which IDFA, EDN and The Financing Forum for Kids Content (Malmö) join forces. Annette Brejner (Financing Forum): “It’s our adult responsibility to introduce the young audience to all aspects of what ‘being human’ means through the work of contemporary storytellers and through films that challenge them in their critical consciousness. We want to elevate the status of documentaries for children to the same level as documentaries for adults.”

Real Young is well aware of certain issues that have yet to be overcome:
- The Film Institutes (like the Swedish Film Institute supporting Real Young) are doing an excellent job in supporting film production. But we need the TV chains on board, who are more interested in series than in movies. So a new format is needed, as was confirmed by no less than four TV stations around the table.
- Even if linear broadcasting is made possible, for the youth of today digital comes first. Strategically you’re lost if you’re not digitally visible.
- Dubbing or subtitling will cause even more problems, not only for TV-stations but also for VOD and online platforms.

This will be a topic for discussion in the next Financing Forum.
- Too often documentaries for young people are considered a stepping stone towards a career into the ‘real’ documentary scene. “To make youth documentaries develop as a genre, we need good filmmakers, awards etc. This genre has to be taken seriously, which is something that Real Young will strive for.”

To install a new, innovative format for children’s documentaries, Real Young is looking for ideas independent of any sort of restrictions. The best ideas will take part in a development workshop, in an EDN Online Pitching Session to financiers and in the Financing Forum for Kids Content.

FILEM’ON INT. EXCHANGE ON FILM FOR PRESCHOOLERS

“Modern media is getting more user friendly and in that way becoming more accessible from a much younger age. Therefore, quality content for toddlers is needed” stated Elise Van Beurden in her keynote speech. “Let us stop describing toddlers as ‘the future audience’! They are the audience of today, and should be valued and treated as whole.”

This was confirmed by a series of artists who came to present their productions during the ‘Film & Media Literacy for Pre-school Children’ symposium, organised by the Filem’on children’s film festival on 31st October in Brussels. The main topic was ‘production’: what media projects for a preschool audience are currently in production? Here you find a summary on some projects presented during this exchange meeting.

<td>Should you offer children only security and recognition? Should you never surprise them by breaching the predictable flow of images? On the contrary, says Nathalie Faber, producer of the Dutch ‘Big Art for Little People’: In the program you see the artistic work of contemporary visual artists specifically tailored for children. “We’re taking the kids’ own creativity to the next level.” Some rules have to be taken in account: Read more</td>

Lead actor Conrad Harwood is only 5 years old, which makes director Knut Naesheim an expert in scripted acting with pre-schoolers. “Charm and talent aren’t enough. Those kids should be willing to work hard.” For Naesheim young actors have to meet many qualifications. They must be: - Willing: receiving orders and correcting yourself can be really tough. - Patient: “We’re testing their patience in the casting process by making them do something silly… and then do it twice.” - Alert: “They should be able to remember many commands one after another and execute them.” Read more</td>

<td>Is every art form suitable for toddlers? Opera surely is, according to Enzo d’Alo (PINOC-CHIO, THE BLUE ARROW). In his ‘Pipi, Pupu &amp; Rosmary’ series he adapted Mozart’s ‘The Magic Flute’ for the youngest audience. This made d’Alo and his Luxembourg producer Paul Thiltges dream of more opera adaptations. Thiltges: “I am fan of ‘Pipi, Pupu &amp; Rosmary’, a series coproduced by our company PTD together with Cometafilm (Italy) and Millimagges. So far we have made 78 x 7’ episodes, one ‘Magic Flute’ special (26’) and 3 half-hour specials based on opera libretto’s are currently in production. The idea is to bring classical opera nearer to children by integrating Pipi, Pupu and Rosmary in the librettos.” Read more</td>

NEW MEMBERS

KINEKO Int. Children’s Film Festival (Tokyo, Japan)

In August 2015 the Tokyo Kinder Film Festival will launch its 23rd edition under a new name: KINEKO Int. Children’s Film Festival! Japan’s biggest Int. Film Festival for Children! We make dreams come true and provide a place where children and parents can learn about the importance of being compassionate. The festival supports parenting and promotes the well being of children by conveying messages through wonderful films.

Founder and director of the Tokyo Kinder Film Festival is the successful businessman Mitsuo Tahira.

In 1992 he started the festival in an attempt to present movies from all over the world to Japanese children. Since this small and modest first edition, the festival has grown into a big event with more than 50,000 admissions annually and a 23rd edition in the making. KINEKO will be the one and only Int. Children’s Film Festival in Japan, receiving support from film industry, mass media and local governments and establishing family festivals all over Japan as children’s film experts.

E Kou (Director of Int. Communications): “All festival activities were focussed on the national territory, but with the new name in 2015, this feels like a fresh start and the ‘reborn festival’ is ready to play an international role and to introduce Japanese films widely to the world. Now becoming ECFA members we’re ready to expand our exchange with other film festivals, but our focus will remain the same: ‘Artistic films for young kids’.”

The festival will not only change its name, but also its venue. “We’ll move to the heart of Tokyo – Shibuya, a place full of energy.

ECFA HONORARY MEMBER OF ALE KINO!

In 2014 ECFA was mostly flattered by Ale Kino!’s recent invitation to join the festival’s Honorary Committee.

Ale Kino! (Poznan, Poland): “In recognition of our many years of collaboration (including an ECFA Award jury in the last three festival editions) we restored the tradition of having ECFA as an Ale Kino! Festival Honorary Committee Member. Being an active member of the association, the festival would welcome ECFA members’ collaboration in exchanging experiences and developing common tools with a view to shape together the European cinema audience of the 21st century. Our 50-years-long experience tells us that it is worth helping young people observe everyday life and discover the world through films. Together with ECFA we would love to initiate discussions and activities on film education and on promoting good European film productions for children and teenagers.”

THOMAS HEINEMANN’S ‘LOLA ON THE PEA’
“Two ponies and one fish”

Ever since her father ‘vanished in thin air’, Lola (11) lives with her mum on a houseboat on the river. More and more Lola withdraws from real life, cherishing her father’s souvenirs and memories. She becomes a loner, an outcast. Until two newcomers shake her world upside down: Kurt, applying to become her mum’s new boyfriend, and Rebin, a refugee boy staying illegally with his family in Germany. They force Lola to take action and leave her world of dreams. LOLA ON THE PEA tackles some serious issues in a playful way, in a festive celebration of colours and music. This makes the film by Thomas Heinemann perfectly accessible for a very young audience. We only wondered why in LOLA ON THE PEA some adults behave like caricatures.

Thomas Heinemann: In children’s films in general adults are outsiders with their own agendas and problems. Like the clumsy policeman, who is so proud about his new uniform. The way he jumps on his bicycle is homage to postman Jacques Tati in JOUR DE FÊTE. I’m a big fan of Tati, and the use of sound in his work. Rebin’s father, played by Kurdish actor Ferhat Keskin, is not a caricature. He added a lot to this movie. Many small elements in his performance surprised the young actors and made the scenes look more spontaneous.

How did you find your actors?
Heinemann: I was quite pragmatic in this matter and decided not to organise an open casting. A friend of mine is a teacher in a school nearby the town where we were shooting. He introduced me to some pupils and most of them ended up in the movie. The other actors I knew from the theatre groups that I worked with.

You have a history in children’s theatre? Heinemann: My uncle ran a children’s theatre company in Basel, Switzerland and my father, who was a stage builder, joined them in the early seventies. As an immigrant worker he was sent back to Germany while I stayed in Switzerland, living in a sort of commune, where I wrote my first play at the age of 12. In this theatre group all roles – even adult characters – were played by children. I found that a bit cheesy. When I started my own company, children and adults were equally represented. In those days, you never saw children and adults sharing one stage. We worked in almost every art form: theatre, dance, music. After running this company for 15 years, the stage became too small for me and I lacked new challenges. Film was the next step. I started working with a friend in a production company.

Working with children again?
Heinemann: Not exactly. My first job was convincing Werner Herzog that his script for INVINCIBLE sucked… Not an easy job, and for sure I failed! Now LOLA ON THE PEA takes me back to my roots, literally! Several actors in the movie used to play as children in our theatre group years ago. This made me feel like a family patriarch.

By telling the story the way you did, you enable yourself to introduce serious issues (divorce, asylum seekers, etc.) to an exceptionally young audience.
Heinemann: Some people don’t like me using a humorous tone to bring up serious issues. But for me this is the way to do it. That’s why also the art design is very elaborated. Like on the boat, creating the atmosphere of a place where you would actually like to live. And usually colour grading is only a small job, but for LOLA it took us 15 days. Moreover we had some bad weather during the shooting that we had to cover up in the post production.

What happened to the boat afterwards?
Heinemann: That’s a tricky question. The film woke up sleeping dogs. We planned to sail the boat up the river to shoot some scenes, but out as a houseboat, this vehicle was illegal. This caused serious troubles for the owner, who had to sell his boat. Now the village governance bought it. They have a new destiny for it in mind.

Do you perhaps treasure a romantic sailor man’s dream, considering all the shipping nostalgia in LOLA?
Heinemann: This element I can’t explain, but it adds a certain airiness to the movie. Maybe it is because I grew up on movies with Errol Flynn, that I saw every Sunday with my dad in the local cinema.

Music plays an important role in the movie, with a ‘brass battle’ as the ultimate climax. Heinemann: In my theatre days, we often introduced children to brilliant music that normally they would never listen to. I hate those popular pop rock songs on a soundtrack. I prefer a wide spectrum of musical styles: brass music, country, surf, Balkan beats… The final musical battle was a huge challenge for the composer: traditional brass music with an oriental beat… But the song nowadays is often played on the radio, so apparently it worked out well.

By the way: congratulations for having the courage to make a children’s film without a single animal appearance. A dignified decision! Heinemann: I should remind you there was one scene with 2 ponies and one with a fish! We saved the fish’s life, as he was originally intended to be sold as live bait. (GH)
